More Lord Howe

A place of extraordinary contrasts, with rugged volcanic peaks, lush forests and serene lagoons, Lord Howe Island is encircled by the southern-most coral reef in the world and was inscribed on the UNESCO World Heritage List in 1982.

As one of only four island groups in the world celebrated for its rare collection of plants, birds and marine life and exceptional natural beauty, a mere 280 people are lucky enough to call the Island home and to preserve Lord Howe's unique and precious natural environment, visitor numbers are restricted, by law, to 400 at any one time.

Lord Howe Island and its surrounding islets are the eroded remnants of a large shield volcano that erupted from the ocean floor some 7 million years ago. Over time, marine erosion has reduced the main Island to approximately one fortieth of its original size. Today, the extraordinarily scenic Lord Howe Island is just 11kilometres long and approximately 3 kilometres at its widest point.

One of the Island's icons, the majestic Ball's Pyramid – the largest monolithic sea rock in the world - is part of the same undersea ridge called the Lord Howe Rise. At its southern end, is Lord Howe Island's signature twin peaks the astonishing Mt Lidgbird and Mt Gower that rise 875 metres high.

With two-thirds of Lord Howe is covered by lush forest and spectacular bushland, the Island is ideal for nature strolls. There are a variety of walks and hikes catering for all fitness levels. Not surprisingly, the Island attracts prolific bird life with some 130 permanent and migratory species.

Similarly, Lord Howe's surrounding waters have been declared a Marine Park with almost 500 fish species and more than 80 coral species recorded – 4% of these coral types are unique to Lord Howe waters.
